Dynamics of Business Risk - Far greater and unpredictable

Business Risk goes beyond business plans

- ▲ Risks can come from uncertainty in financial markets, project failures, legal liabilities, credit risk, accidents, natural causes and disasters as well as deliberate attacks from an adversary.
- ▲ Senior managers and business developers need to know how different legal and regulatory environments, political rivalries and potential instability will affect the business.
- ▲ And on a local ground level you have to consider the effects your operations may have on specific communities (there are several instances of this nature India that include Posco, and Tata's experience in Orissa and West Bengal and more recently Areva's experience with the Jaitapur plant in Maharashtra).

Competitive Edge

Ability to receive critical Business Intelligence providing knowledge within a global context of legislation, regulation and local and international pressure groups, where corporate governance and reputation is of paramount importance.

Understanding, monitoring and preparing for these risks can provide a real competitive edge.

Need for Specialised Business Intelligence

- ▲ Conducting a detailed and focused risk assessment for new investments can mean the difference between success and failure.
- ▲ In many instances political, business and cultural risks only become apparent once you have already committed significant financial resources to a project, but identifying the potential impact of these issues from the outset helps you to manage them correctly.
- ▲ Conducting risk assessments of ongoing projects and supply chains can help to identify existing problems and vulnerabilities. Around 54 per cent of the Indian companies surveyed in September this year said they were likely or highly likely to acquire other companies in the next 12 months.
- ▲ Similarly, an increasing number of foreign companies are also looking to enter India and expand operations. All this will require stringent in-depth risk assessment on the ground of varied factors that may affect investments

Riskpro India has a network of journalists, former bureaucrats, political analysts, security experts based in all corners of India. Most of them have spent an average 15 years in their respective domain working for premier organizations that include government sector, media and security services.
